Some notes about the recent paintings on carbon fibre.

"Carbon two" as we're calling it is presented slightly differently from the pieces that I exhibited in Cork Street last year, the corecell which is the thicker backing to the paintings no longer comes to the outer edge but is chamfered and inset about 50 mm; also it is painted black. The effect is of a thin piece of material floating 50 mm away from the wall, similar to the works on paper but of course without a frame. They are perfectly strong as the carbon is virtually unbreakable. A section of the corecell along the top edge of the back of the painting is cut away and picture cord strung between two d-rings. This allows the painting to be hung flat to the wall on two picture hooks hidden discreetly behind the picture.
